Your details tell a story

With an adult / 10-20 minutes

NOTICE

A name on a school badge, a house number in a photo and a location pin can reveal more than a person expects. Before sharing, think about what the other person could learn. Even an ordinary picture may include private clues.

In this book, use pretend details. You never need to write your home address, school, phone number or real password to finish an activity.

TRY TOGETHER

01 Read this fictional post: "I am outside my school gate every day at three."

02 Name two clues that could help someone locate the person.

03 Rewrite the message without identifying a place or a routine.

YOUR TURN

Two private clues in the post:

A less revealing version:

- [ ] I can spot private clues before sharing.

Adult note: Keep the discussion general. Do not collect identifying details from children in a class.

Answer guidance 1

Accept sensible answers in the child's own words. Look for reasoning and help-seeking, rather than memorised phrases.

01 Private clues

The post identifies a school location and a regular time. A less revealing version could be "I enjoyed my day." Many rewrites work; do not insist on posting anything.

02 Password pressure

A suitable refusal is "I keep account details private." An adult can explain account management and different passwords without collecting the child's password.

03 Codes

The person wants an authentication or payment code. The child should not retrieve or send it. Ask an adult to check the unexpected request.

04 Familiar labels

Pressure, a surprising request and family details are reasons to pause. An adult could use the school contact they already have, not the contact in the message.
